THE JAPANESE LANGUAGE.

Among the other problems confronting Japan is the proposed reform of printed characters of her language. So far the empire has got along in all the changes which have come to her, social, political, and industrial, with the old ideographic system of writing but so many new words, phrases and ideas of foreign origin and nature have arisen and compelled their use that the cumbersome ancient characters of Chinese or native origin have for many purposes become useless. A plan proposed in Tokio is to adopt English in addition to the language as used at present. In the interest of commerce both England and America would, of course prefer this. Volapuk and Esperanto have been considered, but the scholars reject them. It is thought that English is going to prevail. Its increased use in the East and on the European Continent shows that it is crowding French as a means of universal communication.
